For some years now, MONOCLE has been sputtering along as the nation's only organ devoted exclusively or primarily to political satire.

At first we called ourselves "a leisurely quarterly of political satire" meaning that we came out twice a year. Then we adopted the successive designations of "journal," "magazine," and "periodical." With our last issue we announced that henceforth, like the UN police force, we would come out only when there is a crisis. We called ourselves an "Emergency Bulletin."

Actually, what we are is a "sporadical." A sporadical differs from a periodical in that its timetable is dictated by editorial rather than commercial considerations. That is why subscribers to MONOCLE are risk-takers. Their ten issues might arrive in one-year—or it might take five years. But that's the price of a radical sporadical (ten issues for $7.50).
